1. Provide the rationale for proposing this course:

In recent times, domestic and international terrorism has become a distressing feature of social life for the world's people. Between 1981 and 2001 there were 9,000 separate acts of international terrorism, and between 1996 and 2001 over 18,000 people were killed or injured by these attacks. While these numbers are relatively small in comparison to other forms of mass political violence (e.g., civil war), the social and social-psychological impact of terrorism should not be underestimated. For instance, the economic costs of the 9/11 attacks run into the hundreds of billions of dollars, and changes in civil rights laws have in some cases been drastic. For these reasons, terrorism has become a critical area of study for the social sciences.

The purpose of this course is to provide a broad review of the definitions, histories, types, and theories of terrorism, with a special focus on sociological approaches (e.g., identity formation, social movements theory, network analysis). Moreover, we will be discussing the consequences of terrorism in terms of social responses to terrorism (e.g., urban design, homeland security), the social costs of such responses (e.g., shifts in social psychology and civil rights), and potential sociological/criminological remedies that might prevent terrorism in the future.
